To satisfy the needs of gourmets in China amid the ongoing Japanese cuisine boom there, Shanghai MingYing Xuan Catering Management Co., Ltd. opened Food 88. The new establishment will offer "a little luxury" Japanese cuisine for young urban Chinese people who now expect their living standards to improve constantly.

The number eight has traditionally been considered verty auspicious in both Japanese and Chinese culture. The name of the new establishment, Food 88^{*1} , comes from this shared heritage.

Food 88 opened today, November 1st (Friday), in SuFresh^{*2}, as a foot hall in a fresh food supermarket in Wujiaochang, Yangpu District, one of the four city centers and also one of the ten largest commercial areas in Shanghai. It exclusively offers Japanese dishes to commuters, residents alike and, in doing so, accumulates data regarding loclas' tastes and eating habits to further improve its operation.

We offer authentic Japanese cuisine, which attaches utmost importance to bringing out the best of natural ingredients in each season through the store hours from breakfast to dinner, for example, rice balls and porridge for breakfast or lunch and Japanese beef bento or salmon and roe bento for dinner for affordable prices. In addition, customers will appreciate how good Hokkaido rice is even after it cools.

Together with Sake Museum that opened on October 15th (Friday), Food 88 will be our vehicle to introduce Japanese culture and experience to the Chinese market.
